The air was bright and scented, people stayed in their locus amoenus enjoying their tiny sunny gardens, lying on a chaise longue, reading or eating, as if they were on vacation - I must admit that I envied them, and that staged privacy so unusual in big towns. It was like being in a movie, or better, as if they were in a movie and me watching them from behind a screen - an unreal scene in an unreal city. At the very end of the street - outside that oasis - [a] block of small, coloured and stylish houses awaited me, once again an unexpected view. I couldn't really tell the age of those original forms - it might be in between the two World Wars, or even before, refurbished houses of the end of 19th century. Once at home I would do some historical investigation for sure, but meanwhile I was enjoying that strangeness, and started tracing then a colour vein of yellow and pink that suddenly appeared spread out by and by, once reached the large streets Eastbound that encircled the small village
